ACTnow's Note

One of the most serious incidents which happened in Malaysia before Covid-19, was the Sungai Kim Kim, Pasir Gudang toxic water pollution which has affected the health of 6,000 people, including the closure of 111 schools in the district. This happened back in 2019, where the 1.5KM stretch of the river had been badly polluted with illegal waste chemical dumping.

Back then, the former Energy, Technology, Science, Climate Change and Environment Minister Yeo Bee Yin took charge to run an extensive cleaning operation across the river. Apart from ensuring that all the toxic waste was brought out systematically and safely, she also assured the residents around the area that the river is clean after the completion of the operation by conducting the inspection without wearing any safety equipment.

Due to the pollution, Pasir Gudang Pollution Action Committee and 160 people, including 34 students who fell ill, 120 fishermen from Pasir Gudang filed a lawsuit led by lawyer Kamarudin Ahmad against the authorities. The lawsuit involved RM4,000 to RM5,000 compensation for each of the majority of the victims, as well as including RM5mil in compensation for general damages suffered by Irfan Wafiy Idham Wazir, a 12-year-old who was brought into attention due to his diagnosis of myokymia.

Today, residents along Sungai Kim Kim are in fear of repeated toxic waste pollution after sighting black and oily patches appearing in the river. It has been exactly two years since the first massive incident in 2019. If this is repeated again, ACTnow fears that it might cause thousands of people once again, affecting their income, health, and trust in the authorities by the people of Sungai Kim Kim.

ACTnow hopes that authorities will take stern and immediate action to prevent such incidents from happening as well as the public who is residing in the area to report any suspicious activity around that area, either to the authorities or through ACTnow Mobile Application, which we will, too, bring into the attention of the authorities.
